Modern automobiles contain electronic control systems, communication systems, and a large number of power consuming electronic components. This has led to the growth of the “Green Revolution” in which automobile manufacturers and consumers strive for reduced power consumption. In response, there has been renewed interest in electrically powered vehicles. Automobiles powered by electrical energy storage cells are typically referred to as electric or hybrid electric vehicles. A hybrid vehicle, therefore, is one which employs both an internal combustion engine and a battery, typically a lead-acid or a nickel-cadmium battery, to provide power to an electric drive motor to drive the vehicle. Depending on the position of the switch, such a vehicle can be referred to as a hybrid electric vehicle or, more generally, as an electro-mechanical vehicle. As a result of the numerous electronic and electrical components which are in these vehicles, these vehicles generally have higher electrical power consumption than traditional vehicles powered by an internal combustion engine.

Q: How to make a general UART program for RS232 communication I have a microcontroller which is able to communicate with RS232 via an existing device (one port). I would like to have a program for my microcontroller which will setup the communication, send data and read data. More specifically, what can I use as the UART library, which is the equivalent of stdio.h? I need something which allows me to use a buffer to create chunks of data to be sent and of course, read data back as well. A: The STM32F20732 has a USART so it's not too difficult to program. The most simple way to do this is : declare a character output vector (32x1 type) for each character in the message, transmit that character if a character is received, add that character to the vector The following example code should give you an idea of how to write this up using 1. #define USART_BAUD (7200) uint8_t buffer[BUFFER_SIZE]; //... void main() { uint8_t i; for(i = 0; i Left ventricular mechanics in patients with Ebstein's anomaly during ergometer exercise. Previous studies on patients with severe tricuspid regurgitation due to Ebstein's anomaly have found diastolic function as well as filling abnormalities. However, the left ventricular systolic function has not been examined. In 18 patients and 16 matched controls, we quantitatively evaluated left ventricular global function and wall motion using tissue Doppler imaging during bicycle exercise. The filling fraction (videodensitometry) was not significantly different between patients and controls (63 +/- 7% versus 68 +/- 6%, respectively). Mean velocity of circumferential fiber shortening was significantly lower in patients than in controls (2.4 +/- 0.7 cm/s versus 3.4 +/- 0.5 cm/s; P =.001), and the ratio between early- and late-diastolic myocardial velocities was lower in patients than in controls (1.23 +/- 0.32 versus 1.96 +/- 0.5, respectively; P =.001). The left ventricular distensibility, measured as the early-to-late diastolic stiffness ratio, was not significantly different between patients and controls (1.30 +/- 0.31 versus 1.74 +/- 0.63; P =.063), and systolic stress-strain relations were comparable. During exercise, patients showed a significantly lower stroke work index than controls (57 +/- 15 versus 74 +/- 15 kg m; P =.04). There was a significant inverse correlation between the left ventricular stroke work index and mean velocity of circumferential fiber shortening during exercise (r = -0.76, P =.002). Patients with severe tricuspid regurgitation due to Ebstein's anomaly have a depressed left ventricular systolic function, in addition to a depressed left ventricular distensibility. These abnormalities may be associated with the diastolic dysfunction.
