Editing is a destructive process. Once you start manipulating an image, you will likely not be able to undo your changes. So make sure you have a backup of the original document. How do I learn about the things that I need to know to use Photoshop? Although Photoshop has a lot to offer, you don't have to know everything about it or its various tools to use it. A cursory glance at it will tell you a lot, but if you want to know what each tool does you'll need to be a bit more in-depth. Also, if you want to produce professional-quality images that look spectacular, you'll need to find the right tool that is designed to help you deliver your message effectively. For detailed information about how to use Photoshop, which products are best suited for your needs, and a list of Photoshop resources, see Book 1, Chapter 7. How do I create a document? A document is the Photoshop document format. You create it the same way you would create any other document using the Create, Edit, Open, and Save commands. The main thing to keep in mind is that Photoshop opens files in a format that doesn't allow you to easily insert other documents. So instead of using the Open dialog to open other files, it opens Photoshop documents. For this reason, you'll often open a Photoshop document using the File Open dialog as a template for what you want to do. Figure 7-1 shows how to open a Photoshop document from the File Open dialog. Photoshop manages your files in a very different way than other programs. The basic idea is that you open an image and save it to a file format. You can then move that image to different places, change its size, and use other effects without having to create a new image. The first time you open a Photoshop file, it works like any other file you have opened. You edit the document, save it, and print it. Photoshop has several project types, which act like templates that let you save different versions of an image. After you finish editing an image and save it as a copy, you can view the original version, and if you choose to, you can open the same Photoshop document again and begin editing it again. Before you create your own document, be sure you understand Photoshop's memory system, which enables you to edit an image many times without creating duplicate documents. Also, when working in any image-editing

If I had to rank my favourite PvE quest as of right now, it would be the quest in Cata called The Sisters of Elune. Co-written by Matt Hardison (I'm certain I'm right about this), and Adam Morgan (who does some of the voice acting for it) it features this really cool Eldress Lin'luh. It's easily one of the best voices on the game, and I absolutely love it. (She's the one with a weird name, look it up) I remember when it started rolling out that I would play it and be like "this quest is actually really good!". I then replayed it on Karazhan (maybe a few times), and it kept getting better, and better, and better... Perhaps my favourite line from the entire quest was something an NPC said to her, which I heard while making sure a tough path had properly spawned. They said "thank you for your help, and I hope it is comforting to know I have others out there who care and will defend Elune's children." Wow. I went and re-read that last paragraph from the quest quest again, and it made me smile. It's a powerful statement, and I genuinely have no idea how much of a help it was. "Well, it's just fantastic that Elune's children are safe from the beasts of the world", you may reply. Don't be so quick to discount it, though. The bit I like the most isn't just that I can feel some kind-of sorta kinship for the Light-Celestials. It's that the Nameless Lich (who is, and I'm sure is meant to be, also a Light-Celestial) sits in this tower and fights for the Light. Not just one or two Light-Celestials, but a bunch. I don't know, to be frank. The whole idea just flies in the face of all logic. It's like saying "hey, you know those annoying people in the real world who keep playing more MMOs? Well, we're going to fix that by sending them all on a quest to win this epic battle!"
